After you get angry and step your paper, just poke your finger into water, pull it out; and look at the hole. Then you will know how badly you are missed. A man who thinks a paper cannot thrive without his support ought to go away and stay awhile. When he comes back, half his friends will not know he has gone and the other half will not care, while the world at large kept no account of his movements. You will find things you cannot endorse in every paper.—Exchange.

A recent land office ruling, relative to permits to cut public timber, provides that permits shall hereafter not embrace more than a quarter section, or 160 acres. Also that an applicant shall not be accorded a second permit unless an urgent necessity exists therefore. Heretofore the custom has been to secure permits to cut timber from three or four sections. The new ruling will be practically prohibitory, as timber grows too sparsely to allow a profit from so small a tract.—Star.
